The Drawings Of Paul Brill

Paul Brill died in Rome in 1626. Paul Brill initially painted in the late Mannerist style developed by his brother. These early landscapes are in the Flemish tradition inaugurated by Joachim Patinir and Pieter Bruegel the Elder and further developed by his own brother. Works from this early period were characterised by a picturesque arrangement of landscape elements and violent contrasts between light and dark.

Paul Brill - Wikipedia

Brill, however, would soon do something different with his art by fusing this northern landscape tradition with Italian classicism. Around 1605, possibly under the influence of Annibale Carracci – who, with Caravaggio, was the leading painter in Rome at the time – he began to turn to easel paintings and to refine his landscapes.

The composition with the strongly pronounced tree on the foreground in combination with a meandering river landscape in the back is typical for the "Lugt-group" which found its origin in the Roman workshop environment of Paul Brill (1554-1626) around the 1590s. The drawings associated with this group all show wooded scenes, often with animals at the foot of trees and executed in a style reminiscent of Titian (1488-1576).
